Hongkong, October 6th, 1885. One of the greatest obstacles which China will encounter in the career of progress on which the Empire seems at last to be entering is the deep seated corruption which prevails throughout all ranks of officialdom. This is a subject which has a special interest for the foreign mercantile community, not only on account of the sympathy naturally entertained with reference to any forward movement in China, but also because of the shadow of coming changes in the mode of collecting the taxation on foreign trade. The Foreign Customs were established on account of the uncertainty of the taxation while under purely native control, more than on account of its amount. The native officials were always ready to compound the dues, and thus an advantage over honest merchants was secured by those most adept light for the first time on the 1st September. in the art of bribery. The high authorities of the Empire are now manifesting a disposition to dispense with the assistance of foreigners in the collection of the Customs revenue, and the change is one which will no doubt come some day, but it is one which the Treaty Powers and foreign merchants must resist to the utmost until the time arrives when some measure of confidence can placed in the integrity of Chinese officials. This is certainly not the case at present. Indeed, so little confidence is entertained by the Chinese themselves in the honesty of the mandaring that they do not even trust them in the distribution of relief in times of public memorial to the Throne by LIANG YO-CHU, a member of the Han-lin Yuan, who makes the assertion that "Every occasion of disaster by flood is followed by the imposiland taxes and Customs dues, which are applied to making good previous defulcations on the part of the collectors." As showing that this idea of the appropriation of funds is generally entertained it may be noted that it has been thought necessary by the Chinese who have interested themselves at Shanghai in the collection of subscriptions for the Kwangtung inundation relief fund to assure the public, through the columns of the N. C. Daily News merchants, and officials have nothing what ever to do with it. . . . No official interference is permitted or attempted, beyond turns of disaster and applications for remission of taxation have become the rule, while the taxation on the productive lands never N. C. Daily News' translations from the Peking Gazette, and is entitled, "A Decree calling the attention of provincial high authorities in emphatic terms to the prevalence | The Comercio says arrivals from Hongkong are of corruption and abuses in every depart. | now granted free pratique : some sickness must ment of the Government administration." turns of expenditure are sent in, and deception is practised upon a scale that renders & C o 's these departments one of the most fertile sources of waste." That the evil is thus recognised and uncompromisingly condemned is so far satisfactory, but it will not be uprooted by a few decrees, nor, it is to be feared, within any very short space of time. It is too deeply seated in Chinese habit and custom for that. The Peking Government really seems desirous, however, of bringing about an improvement, and in the case of opium has placed the collection of the lekin tax in the hands of the Foreign Customs, at the same time giving an intima tion of its intention ultimately to do the same with respect to other goods, subject, of course, to an agreement to that effect being arrived at with the Treaty powers. But before such an agreement can brought about, the Peking Government will have to give evidence of its ability to THE HONGKONG DISPENSARY. |21 effectively control the Provincial authorities and suppress all illegal exactions. That power it possesses to only a very limited extent at present; the mere necessity of publishing such a decree as that from which we have just quoted is in itself sufficient proof of this assertion. The question then time past. She has gone to Shanghai for exarises how the Central Government can consolidate and increase its power in the provinces. EXTRACT. "EXIT TOMMY," Under this heading is published in a recent volume of ballads by Mr. Froderick Langbridge the following pathetic little poom, which we give entire. It is upon the doubt of a little boy who takes a solemn leave of all his friends and favourites, and playthings, before he woes; his wourite rabbit being the creature apparently from which he finds it hardest to part :-But hash ! the voice from the little bed, And the watchful mother bent her head, "Mammy, I know that I'm soon to die, And I want to wish them all good-bye. "I shouldn't like anything here to say, ' Ho didn't shake hands when he went away : He was glad to be off to his harp and wings, And couldn't remember his poor old things." "In Heaven I never should feel content, If I hadn't been kind before I went; So let me take leave of them, great and small. Animals, people, and toys, and all." So the word went forth, and in no great while The servants entered in solemn file; The stout old cook, and the housemaid Rose, And the aproved boy with his smutted nose. So each of the women, with streaming check, Bent over and kissed him and could not speak: But he said that they must not grieve and cry, For they'd meet again in the happy sky. "I was longer and harder to deal with Jim-The child grew grave as he looked at him, For he thought to himself, "He bets and swear And I hardly believe that he says his prayers." "Oh Jim, door Jim, if you do such things You'll nover be dressed in a harp and wings." He talked to the boy as a father should And begged him hard to be grave and good. The lad lounged out with a brazon air And whistled derisively down the stair, But they found him hid in the hole for coal. Sobbing and praying in grief of soul. Old "Pover" came next, ecdate and good, And gazed at his master and understood.

Then up we carried, in order due, " Maria," the cat, and her kittens two. Proud purred the mother, and arched her back, And vaunted her kittens, one white one black; And the sweet white kitten was good and still, But the black one played with his nightgown's fril He stroked them all with his poor weak hand, But he felt that they could not understand He smiled, however, and was not vext, And bade us bring him the rabbit next. He welcomed," Punch" with a loving smile. And hugged him close in his arms awhile, And we knew (for the dear child's eyes grow dir How grievous it was to part with him. His mother he bade, with tearful cheek, Give "Punch" his carrot three days a week, With lettuce-leaves on a cautious plan, And only just moisten his daily bran. Then next we brought to him, one by one His dram and his trumpet, his sword and gun; And we lifted up for his fondling hand His good grey steed on the rocking-stand. Then close to his feet we placed a tray, And we set his armies in array; And his eyes were bright with fire and dew As we propped him up for his last review.

His ark came next, and pair by pair Passed boasts of the earth and fowls of the air: He kissed good Japheth, and Ham, and Shom, And waved his hands to the rest of them. But we saw that his eyes had lost their fire, And his dear little voice began to tire; He lay quite still for a little while, With eyes hulf-closed and a peaceful smile. Then "Mammy," he said, and never stirred And his mother bent for the whispered word; "Give him his carrot each second day," Our Tommy murmured and passed away.

Horaco, again, suggested to Sir George Rose a truly charming compliment. Most people remember Thackeray's comment on a clever man who was remarkably fond of beer-"Take him for half-and-half, we shall not look upon his like again." But perhaps the two happiest quotations ever made from Shakespeare were the work of John Hamilton Reynolds, who remarked of some beef that he was eating that it would have been very good indeed if "damned custom had not brazed it so." It was Reynolds, it will be remembered, who represented himself as taking leave of a hostess "under the shade of melancholy bows." Luttrell, speaking of Daniel O'Connell, said that.
